Sent from my iPad Young people in the YJ system would be better served if information relating to their journey thru the system was shared and positively used. .it is beyond comprehension that different parts of government services can be so good at what they do, yet so bad at providing information to colleagues . This applies within DHHS, ie Housing-Disability-Mental Health-Child Protection-Out of Home Care, and more broadly as a young person's issues become more general, ie Social Security, Education, Health, family status (many of the young people who come before the Board are parents,) The Board should be provided with information as a matter of course, and statistics also information should be at hand. At any one time, we would not know, for instance how many children and young people of aboriginal heritage were in the system, how many were parents, how many had a mental illness etc. BG
